Harnessing Content On Demand

Your Business Information Assets

Information is undoubtedly one of the most important assets of your business. Its existence is critical for making viable and timely strategic decisions, fostering product development, driving marketing, empowering world-class customer service, and generating revenue. The information and intellectual property your company spends considerable time and money creating, and collecting, is contained in your business content.

"Technology has given us more places to store things, which means more places to lose things." Jan Jasper, time expert

Your content is a strategic, operational asset that must be carefully scrutinized, managed, leveraged and protected.

Realizing A Return On Business Content

Your business generates huge volumes of information that can fuel productivity and enrich your relationships with customers, partners and employees. But if your organization is like most, 85 percent of this information does not fall into the structured formats of automated and indexed file systems or databases. Content streams in and out of your business 24 hours a day, from multiple channels and in various unstructured formats such as e-mail, instant messages, images, documents, audio, video and Web content. As you strive to make your operations more cost-effective and efficient, Enterprise Content Management (ECM) can help you address a critical challenge — managing and integrating all forms of information across diverse platforms, solutions and business processes — and delivering it to end users when, where and how they need it.

Business Content Exposes Your Business In Ways You May Not Realize

And while content is streaming in and out of your business, there is also the alphabet soup of compliance requirements laws, corporate policy rules and potential litigation exposure your business content can be susceptible to every day. The net result? Today's rules of managing and protecting your business information have changed. The stakes are high. How well your company intelligently manages, monitors and audits content will make or break your business.
